&lt;/lyrics&gt;

Once upon a time, in the glorious country
The prince left alone to go hunting
Entering the forbidden forest
He took his feet to the cliff

If he noticed the moon, the night would not have fallen

In that time of dizziness, the golden figure got closer
The sublimely towering horns, the single godly buck
Facing the mysterious light, as if the young man got rid of his will He set up the bow and arrow and aimed Bending the bowstring with a steel arrow

"I do not value my life,"
The deer said with a silver voice,
"But I am protecting this forest,
And if I die, everything will turn into thorns
And your city will be ruined."

He thrust into its heart
Then he took the golden skin and head to his prospering castle

Many years have passed since the prince became king
The country torn in war is weakening
Thorns grow all on the castle walls
The people exchange grievances
Love and happiness become so distant

Before long, until there were things to eat, the people were filled with hunger and thirst
He went to the forest, but there were only rotten trees, not even a sprout
Even the spring had dried, not even the shadow of an animal was there,
And a breeze passed, but worn out, he collapsed
When he opened his two eyes, there was a young golden buck

"You are the foe of my father,"
Echoed this voice he heard once before,
"But nothing can resurrect the corpses
And your changed kingdom,
Except for you and no one else.

With this eternal flesh and blood of mine,
Will you save the people of your country?"

"I shall offer my life,"
Cried the buck with a silver voice
And while the king had tears spilling from his eyes,
He shot an arrow into its soft heart
Confessing the crime of that day from his heart,
He repented and the king lived in the forbidden colors of the light

While he continued to wear the two layers of rough skin until he died
