Elliot Smith, Last Call

last call, he was sick of it all asleep at home told you off and goodbye well you know one day it'll come to haunt you that you didn't tell him quite the truth you're a crisis, you're an icicle you're a tongueless talker you don't care what you say you're a jaywalker and you just, just walk away and that's all you do the clap of the fading out sound of your shoes made him wonder who he thought that he knew last call, he was sick of it all the endless stream of reminders made him so sick of you, sick of you, sick of you sick of your sound, sick of you coming around trying to crawl under my skin when I already shed my best defense it comes out all around that you won and I think I'm all done you can switch me off safely while I'm lying here waiting for sleep to overtake me yeah, yeah you're still here but just check to make sure all you aspired to do was endure you can't ask for more, ask for none knowing you'll never get that what you ask for so you cast your shadow everywhere like the man in the moon you start to drink you just want to continue it'll all be yester year soon you start to drink you just want to continue it'll all be yester year soon church bells and now I'm awakeand I guess it must be some kind of holiday I can't seem to join in the celebration but I'll go to the service and I'll go to pray and I'll sing the praises of my maker's name like I was as good as she made me and I wanted her to tell me that she would never wake me I wanted her to tell me that she would never wake me ...

I'm lying here waiting for sleep to overtake me
