Kings Of Convenience, I Don't Know What I Can

You called me after midnight, must have been three years since we last spoke. I slowly tried to bring back, the image of your face from the memories so old. I tried so hard to follow, but didn't catch the half of what had gone wrong, said I don't know what I can save you from.

I asked you to come over, and within half an hour, you were at my door.
I had never really known you, but I realized that the one you were before, had changed into somebody for whom I wouldn't mind to put the kettle on.
Still I don't know what I can save you from.
