

Sieges Even, The Waking Hours

I search the missing link that interlinks the tattered ends of a chain undone I watch the faceless shades passing by in lethargic state, dreaming of something to occur.
I walk through canyons of concrete where the poet gets lost and a walking eye weeps, where no visionary dares to reside.
And I sense Sisyphus climbing the hill with panting steps for this sad time weighs his run.

In every waking hour
In any kind of golden light
In every moment of conception
In every hour you try to feel always lies a sense of change

I feel the sense of change as Sisyphus clutches at life but the lifeless shades of monotony obscure his brightest day Is all that's left a plain choice, to last or to fall on the edge of collective drab?

Must we find fortune in constant revolt?

In every waking hour
In any kind of golden light
In every moment of conception
In every hour you try to awake