Subtle, Hollow Hollered

Your blood owns no bones, With mailmen in your home Holding a knife to your poems To hollow all you're sown And holler goner, you're owned.'

Where in the human who

And supposing you was meant to be bent born some sort of law man, With the poise of an intellectual and hunch of a clerk, And disposition of a saint And they'd say, he is always with cancel eye and ever correct' And knowing that Are you less In the ever so complicated endeavor of a human death

There are only two species set to death on earth The creature of choice And the creature

Are you?

And supposing you was meant to be bent sole keeper
Of the kilometer-long list of things certain to be so.
The human plight right there in 1's and 0's.
And he who knows all that's owed
You'd think would be considerably more fearless,
Unless, of course, he feels this
Heat of something coming to adjust his Eminence accordingly

To go on stealing poems,
From the homed armed with only a key comb
Letter opener carved from bone wish,
With which to pick
The simple levers of locks
To fly things well beyond the sky of your clock.

Your blood owns no bones, With mailmen in your home Holding a knife to your poems To hollow all you're sown And holler goner, you're owned.'
