Wide Mouth Mason, Sister Sally

Sister Sally rides a train on the east side She takes a long way home If you ask her she'll just smile and say she don't know where she's going The train is crowded but she looks so alone

She's got a man who says he loves her and then he hurts her She swears he only does it when he's mad If it was up to her this train would keep on running (maybe forever) But for now it leads her right back to his hands

Chorus

So driver take the train to another place tonight He's waiting and her supper's getting cold Her heart's too big for him to make her feel so small And she's much too young to look so old

There's something that hurts more than the punches There's something that hurts more than his hands That's of all the names she could call him She can't call him anything but her man
