

Alexisonfire, The Philosophical Significance

Life gets dull. Life always gets dull. Life stays dull too, at least until something eventful happens. Even if it's just a minor event, it can change your perspective on life. I'm constantly finding life uninteresting and repetitive, and I'm continually craving change. To fall into a rut is to fall into a dull life. My perspective on life was much different last Wednesday, eating cereal with my sister at the breakfast table. Minor events do make a difference in how you view life, of that there is no doubt, but it's usually on a small scale. So, how do you avoid your life getting dull, without having to get so drastic as to kill a family member? Before I had my revelation about trying new things to make my life exciting and new, I was a very serious person. Sometimes major events aren't as drastic as a bullet being blast through the upper right portion of a person's head. Now, this brings up another interesting dilemma: How do you think of something that you've never thought of before? No matter what you do to alter your currently dull views on life, remember not to dwell on the bad events.