

Dead Infection, Life Of A Surgeon

Richard graduated from a medical academy three months ago. He passed the exams perfectly. He's been working as a cardiac surgeon for a week now. He was to face his very first patient at a September night. He was dashing and yet fearful. His bread and cheese for saving other people's lives. The patient is 68. It is his second heart attack. Richard makes the first cut. Scalpel in his hand moves smoothly like a conductor's baton. Arteries make visible. Richard feels warm blood drops on his forehead. Then he feels his stomach in his mouth. He used to see intestines when he served his apprenticeship. But today he couldn't stand it. The dinner he ate an hour ago flows down from his covered mouth onto the patient's torso. Pieces of semi-digested meal mingle in a seven-centimetre long surgeon cut. Vomited matter ornaments the patient's torso and soothes him. Richard thought his job would be different. His conscience exhausted him.
