

Every Man For Himself, Mauriora

A gaping chasm divides our indigenous world from wider society.

Over-stretched between the two, and clutching for the latter too many have surrendered their grip on identity.

The language lost, tribal lands now distanced by more the geography, and inheritance waived.

Isolated. Estranged. They become rootless like the Kumara.

Dead, decaying

Access to and interaction with language, culture, resources and its' support networks must then become more readily available.

Maori must be re-immersed in all aspects of Maoritanga.

Diminished the distance between the world before the culture and its peoples' identity are separated forever.