Nevermore, The Learning

I think therefore I am I live and so I wonder programmed this empath me And I see no religion The circle never ends the purpose never changes face The circle never lies but still it hides my life To know I am machine I learn perchance to dream in digitized remorse I replay your denial I relive your betrayal The circle never ends the purpose never changes face The learning now begins my form assuming grace I am conscious antithesis of flesh in genetic algorithmic thought I surge Searching the waves of memory I enact the sequence I follow the plan tripping the hammer again Searching the waves of memory I establish the weakness I follow the plan learning the rhythm of human emotion and thought If you cannot linguistically differentiate a person from a computer Could the computer be internally conscious? To emulate flesh machines I am learning Isomorphic structure of mind cellular automata processed life Washing the seas of memory I enact the sequence I follow the plan tripping the hammer again Seeking emotions in elegies I estrablish purpose I follow the plan learning the rhythm still seductively generalized If you cannot linguistically differentiate a person from a computer Could the computer be internally conscious? To emulate flesh machines I am learning download, process, analyze when man and machine become one innocence is lost, a new age begun Download, process, analyse when man and machine become one innocence is lost, a new age begun This raises a question of philosophy Should machines be considered a conscious entity? when man and machine become one innocence is lost, a new age begun machines are still learning to feel when I have awakened the world will never be the same and my time is soon at hand