

Peter Hammill, Nightman

At the dead of night, I woke with the sense that my dreams were escaping, all uncannily unspoken
like words at the tip of a foreign tongue...

As for language, I have none to express quite what strangeness overwhelms me:
something's changed and something tells me to be still in the roar of the distant stars.
The night's full of fire, ice and water;
by day I'll have clay in my hands.

The book is open at a well-thumbed mark the odds are stacked that I'm facing.
Eyes grown accustomed to light and dark can't catch the shadows they're chasing.
Open, my heart, to the vital spark a disordered rhythm is racing, it's a danse macabre I'm tracing.

As the fire feeds the flame,
as the tongue finds expression in its flickering, does each breath inform a name
to be dispersed just as soon as it's exhaled?
Was it to myself I came
or to some other strange and parallel existence?
Will I ever see tomorrow,
to wake and begin it again?

Open, the book at a well-read page,
hope triumphs over expectation;
open, the secrets of seer and sage in awe-inspired anticipation...

Open, my mind in the body's cage, unchained in consecration;
open, my eyes, to the wider stage
the firestorm of liberation
the night in conflagration.

With a shiver down my spine
I come back to the place where I started;
the sea of consciousness has parted
but stranded is all that I feel for sure.
As nightsight declines into darkness by day there'll be clay in my hands.
I may feel the clay in my hands.