Trans-Siberian Orchestra, O' Come All Ye Faithfu

(NARRATION)

Looking at his son across the room He feared to cross that divide But how long could he stay in this dark That allows us all to hide

Is there a wrong so great in life That it undoes every good we've ever done Is there an act so good it would undo all our wrongs Every single one?

And in putting his whole Life into this gesture Would failing make it Any lesser?

Then through the window he thought he saw In the falling snow so near The outline of his son's mother's face But then it disappeared

It was only there for a second And a second's not long, but yet It was enough to cause that man To take that very first step

And that step was followed by another In that room still lit so dim And before he realized how far he had gone His son was directly in front of him

Then the father noticed on the windowsill An old photo that he long ago had seen It was a picture of him and his wife When they were both about nineteen

It was leaning against a folder
That said "property of the deceased"
And underneath was his wife's name
And the date it had been released

It was obviously her personal possessions

That had been given to his son Because since he had left them all behind The child was the only one

His son must have always kept it with him
For the folder was weathered and torn
And he must have gazed at that picture countless times
For it was also all tattered and worn

Then his son noticed him standing there And from his task looked up And then looked at the picture beside him And that one look, was enough

He recognized it was his father That was now standing there And gave him a smile of pure love and forgiveness And of the past, he did not care He did not care where he had been The whys, the wheres, the hows He only cared that his father was there Standing by him now

Then the father turned and walked across the room Which by now had lost its distance And went to the nearest incubator And picked up a trembling infant

And with the child within his arms He returned to his son And all the pain within his soul At that moment was undone

And he sat in the rocking chair beside him With the life he had retrieved And side-by-side together They rocked all through that christmas eve

(O' COME ALL YE FAITHFUL)

~Instrumental~